The end of the HerStory project

The HerStory project is coming to an end, and it has made a lasting difference in how we see the contributions of women.

When we started the first online meeting two years ago, the end of the project felt very far away. But as we worked more closely with our partners, time went by quickly. We still remember when each partner explored their city and found out which women made a big impact in their community.

We also remember when focus groups were held and women's names started coming up—names that were forgotten in history just because they were women, even though they made important contributions.

HERSTORY: WHAT HAS BEEN DONE

THE PARTNERS

The project included three in-person meetings and many online ones. These meetings helped us stay on track with the project’s goals. As months went by, the HerStory project began to take shape.

At the start, no one could imagine what the final results would look like, but now we can say they are very important and will help people recognize women in history and their work.

Even though the project is ending, its mission will continue. The materials created will still be available for anyone who visits these cities and wants to learn about the women who made a difference, whether through street names or statues.

HerStory: What has been done

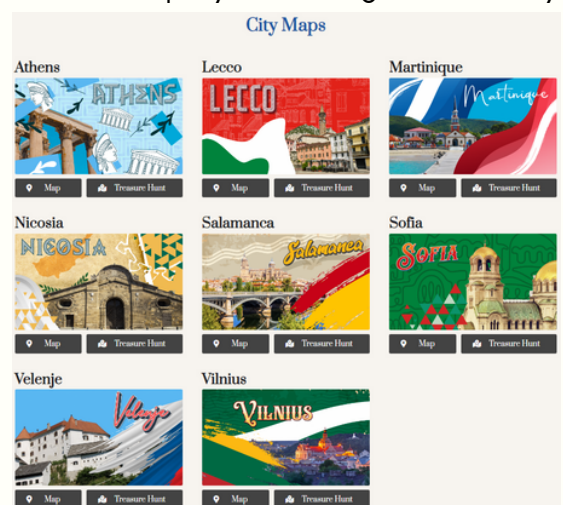

Within the HerStory project a lot of work has been done that will have significant impact on end user.

HerStory aimed to develop a transnational map that highlighted important women in politics, society, science, and the arts, while also bringing attention to significant historical moments where women’s actions played a key role.

The expected results of the project included:

- In-depth research and mapping of local women's histories.
- The development of the HerStory Map.
- Online Platform, and Mobile App, as well as the implementation of learning and
- training activities related to the HerStory Map.

These efforts contributed to raising awareness about the essential roles women have played throughout history.
